T-Mobile told the FCC this week that it was ending its DEI policies. The company has been awaiting FCC approval for two deals. On Thursday, the DOJ announced it would end its separate antitrust probe into one of the company's proposed deals. T-Mobile is facing less regulatory heat from the Trump administration two days after the company signed a letter committing to end its DEI practices. The Justice Department announced on Thursday that it was closing an antitrust probe into T-Mobile's proposed $4.4 billion merger with UScellular. The news comes soon after T-Mobile told the FCC that it was ending diversity, equity, and inclusion policies joining a long list of companies that have pulled back from DEI since President Donald Trump was reelected. "T-Mobile is ending its DEI-related policies not just in name, but in substance," the company wrote in a July 8 letter to Federal Communications Commission Chair Brendan Carr, which was made public a day later on Wednesday. The company is seeking approval from the commission for two separate deals, including the UScellular merger and the acquisition of the internet service provider Metronet. The DOJ had separately launched an antitrust probe into the UScellular deal. In a statement about the closing of the probe, Assistant Attorney General Gail Slater raised concerns about ongoing consolidation in the wireless services industry. "It is of concern to the United States that continued spectrum aggregation by the Big 3 threatens to impede the path for a fourth national player to emerge and challenge the entrenched incumbents with new and innovative offerings," Slater said. "In sum, the Department evaluated the likelihood of harm to competition and the potential effects of the transaction on consumers and determined that, on balance, the potential harm and offsetting benefits of the transaction do not warrant an enforcement action," the assistant attorney general said. Thursday's announcement means the Justice Department will not intervene in the proposed merger, but the deal still must be approved by the FCC. T-Mobile is ending DEI (diversity, equity, and inclusion) policies in an attempt to obtain the Trump administration's approval for two mergers. "As T-Mobile indicated earlier this year, we recognize that the legal and policy landscape surrounding DEI under federal law has changed and we remain fully committed to ensuring that T-Mobile does not have any policies or practices that enable invidious discrimination, whether in fulfillment of DEI or any other purpose." T-Mobile General Counsel Mark Nelson wrote in a July 8 letter that was posted to the Federal Communications Commission's filings website yesterday. "We have conducted a comprehensive review of T-Mobile's policies, programs, and activities, and pursuant to this review, T-Mobile is ending its DEI-related policies as described below, not just in name, but in substance. "It's clear that T-Mobile was trying to influence the FCC's review of its pending transactions because the carrier filed the letter in two dockets: one for its pending acquisition of US Cellular's wireless operations and another for a joint venture to acquire fiber provider Metronet. The FCC observes an informal timeline of 180 days to review mergers; the T-Mobile/US Cellular deal is on day 253. T-Mobile's letter spurred the FCC to approve the Metronet deal in an order released yesterday. "We accept T-Mobile's commitment to modify its practices as firm and definite, and expect that these changes to eliminate DEI practices will prevent discrimination in the post-transaction company, as consistent with the law and the public interest," the July 9 FCC order said. Carr yesterday called T-Mobile's change "another good step forward for equal opportunity, nondiscrimination, and the public interest," and wrote that "President Trump is restoring common sense and racking up wins." Rachael Maskell, Neil Duncan-Jordan and Brian Leishman have confirmed their suspensions. A decade ago, Georgia was the poster child of post-Soviet countries on their way to democracy and freedom. US lawmakers hope a bill will help combat democratic backsliding. Democratic Rep. Pramila Jayapal of Washington joined CNN's Pamela Brown to discuss why her and other Democratic members are now demanding the release of the Epstein files, something the president has tried to downplay and redirect attention from. The Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) has previously noted the obvious demand for authoritative guidance for providers. House Republicans are trying to rev up their government funding work for fiscal 2026 after devoting weeks of energy to pushing through President Trump's megabill, but the timeline is slipping ahead of their coming August recess. With about 20 legislative days on the House calendar ahead of a Sept. 30 government shutdown deadline, top GOP Senators Susan Collins, Lisa Murkowski, and Mitch McConnell criticized the White House for a lack of transparency surrounding the proposed cuts. President Donald Trump is one step closer to having Congress officially sign off on a slice of his Department of Government Efficiency's spending cuts after Senate Republicans agreed TK DATE to cancel $9 billion in funding to foreign aid and public broadcasting. Senate Republicans say they have the votes to pass a package of $9 billion in spending cuts, which would give President Trump another big legislative victory in less than a month, after GOP leaders quelled a revolt from members of the powerful Appropriations Committee. Russell Vought, the director of the Office of Management and Budget. The Senate is working overnight into the early hours of Thursday morning as it weighs whether to claw back $9 billion in federal funds already congressionally approved for foreign aid and public broadcasting programs as a deadline to act on the White House priority looms. "25th Amendment. Now," one user said on social media after Trump's blunder. Now that's multitasking. Tennis champion Serena Williams has surprised her fans after sharing new pictures of her post-retirement body transformation. Take a look at the must-see photos... The White House press secretary is probably used to tough questions, but she seemed a little taken aback by one from Fox News, of all outlets. The tennis legend pulls no punches about losing everything at once. The latest report comes as Trump continues to face fury from both Democrats and Republicans over the handling of the so-called Epstein files. The collection launches on Wednesday. The expensive piece was given as a special gift to mark their third wedding anniversary. Coca-Cola in the U.S. is currently made with high-fructose corn syrup, while the company uses cane sugar in other countries, such as Mexico. The first officer reportedly expressed surprise and panic after the fuel switches were turned off. Across Africa, and in the tiny nation of Eswatini, fury has erupted over the arrival of foreign deportees from the United States, after its government confirmed that migrants described by a Department of Homeland security spokesperson as depraved monsters had been sent to its prisons. A T-Mobile store in New York, March 16, 2023. Wireless carrier T-Mobile US said on Wednesday it is ending its diversity, equity and inclusion programs under pressure from the Trump administration and as it seeks regulatory approval for two major deals. T-Mobile said in a letter to Federal Communications Commission Chair Brendan Carr made public on Wednesday that the wireless company is ending its DEI-related policies "not just in name, but in substance." T-Mobile said it will no longer have any individual roles or teams focused on DEI, is removing any references to DEI on its websites and removed references to DEI from its employee training materials. T-Mobile is awaiting FCC approval to buy almost all of regional carrier United States Cellular's wireless operations including customers, stores and 30% of its spectrum assets in a deal valued at $4.4 billion, and a separate transaction to establish a joint venture with KKR to acquire internet service provider Metronet.
