Whether a couple chooses a religious or a non-religious wedding depends on their faith or lack of it, and their cultural tradition. Humanist wedding ceremonies allow for far greater personalisation than religious ceremonies, which must inevitably follow the directions of a particular church or institution. This allows the ceremony to incorporate words and rituals from a wide range of cultures. Some religious wedding services include gender-biased traditional language that may not truly reflect a couple's own idea of their relationship. Humanist wedding rituals often emphasise the equality of the partners. Rings are exchanged © Humanist weddings In most countries Humanist wedding ceremonies are not legally valid, and a civil ceremony will be required as well. Registered Humanist celebrants can conduct legally binding marriages in Scotland (though not currently England or Wales) as of 2005. Humanist weddings have been increasing in popularity as a result: from 80 in 2004, before legal recognition, to 434 in 2006. This figure rose again in 2007. The British Humanist Association trains and licenses celebrants to conduct non-religious weddings, but anyone can conduct a non-religious ceremony if they wish to do so. The Humanist idea that the marriage depends solely on the efforts and relationship of the couple. Humanist wedding ceremonies may include: Music An introduction that sets out the nature, purpose, and importance of marriage Readings: A ritual of commitment for the bride and groom Ritual actions: These will include an exchange of rings, and perhaps an embrace, candle-lighting, a wine cup ritual or a hand-fastening ritual Formal words pronouncing the couple married A non-religious blessing of the marriage Share – copy and redistribute the material in any medium or format for any purpose, even commercially. Interhuman relationships go back to the early years of civilization, but there is one ritual known the world over that has a much fresher history: marriage. Evidence suggests that marriage as an institution may only be several thousands of years old, and that the idea of one man and one woman spending their lives together has only recently become a binding concept.Many of the modern partner trends, like polyamory and throuples, are actually variations on old themes. Also taking root in historical precedence are fads like the "trad wife" movement, which has been making waves on social media. But even newer than the idea of marriage? The term that you'd marry someone because you actually love them?How old is marriage as an institution? The best available evidence suggests that it's about 4,350 years old. For thousands of years before that, most anthropologists believe, families consisted of loosely organized groups of as many as 30 people, with several male leaders, multiple women shared between them, and children. As hunter-gatherers settled down into agrarian civilizations, society had a need for more stable arrangements. Escape your echo chamber. The first recorded evidence of marriage ceremonies uniting one woman and one man dates from about 2350 B.C., in Mesopotamia. Over the next several hundred years, marriage evolved into a widespread institution embraced by the ancient Hebrews, Greeks and Romans. But back then, marriage had little to do with love or with religion.If marriage wasn't about love, what was it about?Marriage's primary purpose was to bind women to men, and thus guarantee that a man's children were truly his biological heirs. This was particularly important in patriarchal societies where these heirs would often inherit leadership roles. Through marriage, a woman became a man's property. In the betrothal ceremony of ancient Greece, a father would hand over his daughter with these words: "I pledge my daughter for the purpose of producing legitimate offspring."Among the ancient Hebrews, men were free to take several wives; married Greek and Roman men were free to satisfy their sexual urges with concubines, prostitutes and even teenage male lovers, while their wives were required to stay home and tend to the household. It was feared to produce offspring, their husbands could get them back and marry someone else.When did religion become involved?As the Christian church became a powerful instation in Europe, the blessings of a priest became increasingly common. Through the years, "there have been differing views about whether weddings are primarily religious or secular events," said the Christian-based Nelson University. For "much of the early Christian Era, the Church stayed out of weddings and the state handled the union of man and woman." But by the eighth century, Christian churches started to perform weddings, and the ritual became widely accepted as a sacrament.Not all religions view marriage the same; for the Jews, while "no wedding ceremony is described in the Torah, the institution of marriage began with Adam and Eve," said ReformJudaism.org, and most Jewish scholars "agree that 'marriages' originally constituted a man's 'reserving' a particular woman or women as his property." In Islam, marriage "is a contract, not a sacrament," said Brandeis University. And "because it is a contract, it conveys legal rights and obligations to each spouse."When did the state get involved?The shift from "common law" marriages – where two people (or their families) simply declared they were married – to legal marriage began in the church, with the calling of "banns," or public announcements before the marriage in the 13th century. "By the end of the Middle Ages, written marriage contracts had become a regular part of the marriage process," said Jessica Levey at American Marriage Ministries.Marriage licenses arrived in the U.S. in the colonial era – Massachusetts started recording marriages at the local level in 1639 and statewide two years later, according to the University of Massachusetts Amherst. At the time, the husband's dominance was officially recognized under a legal doctrine called "coverture," under which the new bride's identity was absorbed into his. Great Britain introduced non-religion civil marriage in the Marriage Act of 1836. By 1929, all U.S. states had laws on marriage licenses. Marriage became a federal issue with the introduction of the married-couple income tax filing in 1913. When did love enter the picture?As previously mentioned, marriage was viewed in ancient times simply as a binding contract between a man and woman. But in the 18th century, society "encouraged young people to select their marriage partners based on their romantic attachments," said the National Women's History Museum. This represented a notable change from prior eras, when the "brides' and groom's feelings were not of paramount consideration" when it came to selecting a partner. As parents and guardians took a backseat in attempting to find partners for their children, the ceremony that formalized the union became more intimate and personal. The bride and groom were given the right to veto, transforming marriage into a union of two full citizens, and in the following decade a sexual revolution introduced the idea that marriage should be a vehicle for mutual desire and satisfaction. In the 1960s, "we decided marriage was a right," not a guarded (and segregated) privilege, and "in the 1970s, we began to rearrange marriage laws" accordingly, marriage historian Stephanie Coontz said to Connecticut Public Radio. Between 1974 and 1993, U.S. states finally recognized – and banned – marital rape, an idea inconceivable when the husband "owned" his wife's sexuality.Marriage has taken even more of a swing in the last 50 years, particularly when it comes to the wider acceptance of same sex marriages. While the LGBTQ+ community has been pushing for marriage equality for years, it was only in 2001 that the Netherlands became the first country in the world to legalize same sex weddings. Other nations have followed, and particularly in the United States, people "gave our all to ensure every person, regardless of whom they love, is recognized equally under the law," said Humans Rights Watch. The "moment for full marriage equality [in the U.S.] finally arrived on June 26, 2015," when the Supreme Court "granted same-sex couples in all 50 states the right to full, equal recognition under the law."But same-sex marriage remains taboo in some nations, with couples continuing to fight an uphill battle. Same-sex unions are "banned in many states," and the expansion of broader LGBTQ+ rights has been uneven globally," said the Council on Foreign Relations. Still, there continues to be a push, especially in largely conservative places like Russia and African nations, for marriage equality. This can have significant implications for you and your guests. Your ceremony can be personalized to reflect your unique love story, without the constraints of traditional religious elements. You can create a memorable experience that speaks to both you and your partner, making your special day truly yours. Consider what matters most to you both. This is the time to incorporate personal elements, whether that's writing your own vows, choosing a meaningful reading, or even involving close friends and family in the ceremony. Use this opportunity to celebrate your relationship and share your journey with those you love. With so many creative options available, you can design a ceremony that resonates with your values and personality. From music choices to rituals that represent your bond, the possibilities are endless. Embrace this chance to make the ceremony yours! Planning Your Non-Religious Wedding Ceremony Planning a non-religious wedding ceremony can be exciting and meaningful. You have the freedom to make choices that reflect your beliefs and relationship. From selecting an officiant to crafting a personalized ceremony script, there are many ways to express your love. Choosing an officiant is a key decision. A good officiant will not only set the tone and keep everyone comfortable, making your day even more special. Creating a Personalized Ceremony Script Your ceremony script can truly reflect your journey together. Start by discussing what elements are most important. This could include vows, personal anecdotes, or special traditions you want to include. Consider having unique sections in your script, such as a storytelling moment where you share your relationship's highlights. You might also include a "unity ceremony" like a sand blending or candle lighting that symbolizes your union. Personal touches will make the day memorable for both you and your guests. Selection of Music and Readings Music and readings set the mood for your ceremony. Choose songs that are meaningful to you as a couple. This could be instrumental or live music that evokes the feelings you want to share. For readings, think about including poetry, excerpts from books, or even personal letters. You can ask family or friends to share these readings. Make sure everything aligns with the overall vibe you want for your non-religious wedding. These elements can create a warm and inviting atmosphere, emphasizing the love you celebrate. The Ceremony Structure Planning a non-religious wedding ceremony allows you to create a personal experience that resonates with you and your partner. The structure typically includes opening remarks, the exchange of vows, and optional unity rituals, each playing a significant role in the celebration of your love. Opening Remarks and Welcome Begin your ceremony with warm opening remarks that welcome your guests. Thank them for joining you on this special day. This is a moment to set the tone, so share a bit about what love means to you. You can express gratitude and highlight the importance of the gathering. The officiant often takes the lead here, creating an inviting atmosphere. Encourage your guests to feel the love and joy as the ceremony unfolds. Adding a personal story or quote can help connect with everyone present. The Exchange of Vows The exchange of vows is the heart of the ceremony, where you both promise to spend your lives together. You can choose to write your own vows or use pre-written ones. Make sure you have time to read them slowly and sincerely. Consider having a friend or family member hold the rings for you. It can be traditional or personal, reflecting your unique relationship. Your wedding officiant may also invite you to share a few words about what this day means to you. These closing remarks can be simple yet heartfelt. Thank your friends and family for being present. Remind everyone of the love that has brought you all together. Keep these words meaningful, yet brief. The Recessional: Walking Down the Aisle as Spouses As you conclude the ceremony, the recessional marks your first steps as husband and wife. This is a happy moment, where you walk down the aisle together. Consider choosing a song that resonates with both of you as you exit. The recessional is often accompanied by cheers and applause from guests. Enjoy this joyful celebration! This moment signifies the beginning of your life together. Take a moment to look around, soak in the love and support from your family and friends. It's a great way to start your journey as a married couple. You're engaged! Huge congratulations! Now it's time to start your wedding planning. If you're not a religious person, you may be thinking about ways to celebrate your love without including religious content, while still creating a meaningful wedding ceremony. A humanist wedding will allow you to work with a highly trained celebrant to craft a ceremony that reflects your personalities and tells your love story. Here's our simple guide to planning a non-religious wedding ceremony that is both meaningful and memorable. You can decide what elements matter most to you as a couple, choosing to include rituals that you like and leaving out any traditions that don't suit you. A humanist wedding ceremony A humanist ceremony is a great choice for those wanting to plan a wedding that's thoughtful and personal. The beauty of a humanist wedding is that it allows you to create a completely personal event, creating a ceremony that is unique to you. Humanism is a belief in human values like empathy, kindness, and the importance of making the most of the one life we have. Humanists make sense of the world through logic, reason, and evidence, and seek to treat those around us with understanding and respect. Benefits of a humanist celebrant: Personalisation: Your ceremony will be written specifically for you. Your celebrants will work with you to create a unique script and, if you need ideas, be able to offer suggestions for music, readings, and rituals, to make your ceremony totally authentic and personal to you both. Flexibility: There are no set rituals or traditions you need to follow, giving you full creative control to include what you like and leave out what doesn't suit you. Inclusivity: Humanist weddings are welcoming to people of all beliefs, ensuring all guests – including religious guests – feel part of the celebration. Meaning: The focus is on your love and commitment to one another, without including religious content, making the ceremony authentic to you as a couple. By focusing on your commitment you'll have a ceremony that's heartfelt and memorable. Why choose a Humanist Ceremonies wedding celebrant? You can trust a Humanist Ceremonies celebrant.
