Security researchers exposed more than 15 billion usernames and passwords from 100,000 separate data breaches or from others, which are sold or distributed for free online. According to the new report of the German company dealing in information security, Digital Shadows (opens in a new card), many of the violated authentication data were duplicates, but the total number of unique data authenticating accounts still exceeded 5 billion.

Authentication files were obtained as a result of "over 100,000 different data violations, cyber attacks and other data violations," said scientists, adding that "the number of stolen and disclosed authentication data has increased since 2018." It increased by about 300%. Digital Shadows has found that most of the stolen authentication data belonged to "natural persons and users", including data authenticating bank accounts, streaming services, such as Netflix and Spotify, and other platforms that were sold in a dark network, for example for 3- $ 5, except for the allegedly "hacked for life" account, which was sold for 10 USD. Most of the information comes from data violations, but it definitely comes from other ways of stealing data authenticating data, such as checking the us usernames and passwords again.

There are twice as much digital shadows than people on earth. It is quite possible that everyone reading this story has at least one set of stolen authentication data.
